

ENGLAND'S SOUTH COAST, FROM SUSSEX TO THE ISLES OF SCILLY

This is the story of submarines that did not come home in both war and peace. They will remain for eternity as the silent warriors of the south coast.

Submarine warfare in both wars transformed the south coast into a merciless arena, where a life-or-death struggle was played out between U-boats attempting to close the sea-lanes and allied ships striving to keep them open. Combining years of international archival research and expert analysis, this series describes how these submarine wrecks came to be.

In Volume Two Ron Young and Pamela Armstrong tell of submarines lost from Sussex to the Isles of Scilly. Authoritative and meticulously sourced, it is nevertheless the human element which proves most memorable. Huddled with a knot of shivering boat-mates, we endure the anguish of young Rudy Wieser as his stricken boat, U 1195, slowly fills with freezing water and chlorine gas, and nineteen-year-old Franz Neumayr, who survived the sinking of U 1063 with sixteen colleagues. Then there is the tragic quintet of British boats lost in these waters. We read of the last patrols of L24, M2 and M1 and, perhaps most poignantly, of HMS Swordfish. Likewise it is impossible not to be moved by events following the explosion which tore apart HMS Sidon.

Surely destined to become the definitive record of submarine wrecks in British waters, this series will have a ready appeal to anyone with an interest in maritime history.
